ANNOUNCER: "Werner Imhoff, of the Neue Deutsche Zeitung; James M. Minifie of the Canadian Broadcasting Company; and Lothar Loewe, of the German Television Network, talk today with Allen W. Dulles, former director of the Central Intelligence Agency, on 'Meeting of the Minds,' a unique opportunity to hear a discussion between an outstanding American public figure and members of other nations who live and work in this country, and interpret our policies for their countrymen.

"And now, our moderator, Miss Caroline Lewis."

LEWIS: "Hello, and welcome to 'Meeting of the Minds.' A special welcome to you, our guest, Mr. Allen Dulles. We're very glad to have you here.

"Mr. Dulles is, as you all know, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency. He was a member of the Warren Commission which investigated the assassination of President Kennedy. He's the author of many books, and his most recent book is 'The Secret Surrender,' the story of the Germans' surrender in the Second World War, and it's published by Harper & Rowe.

"Can I throw the first question over to you, Mr. Imhoff?"

"How is the character of the spy business changing in your opinion?"

IMHOFF: "Yes, Mr. Dulles, I was wondering, isn't the business changing really more and more into a scientific enterprise? Sometime ago you wrote a book about the craft of intelligence. Would you still choose that title today, or would you perhaps put the emphasis more on the scientific side, with all the sophisticated technology that plays so large a role?"

DULLES: "No, I don't think I would change it, Mr. Imhoff, because after all, you need the human beings. If you have the instruments, you have to have the human beings to run the instruments, whatever it may be, whether it is radio, television, radar, whatever it may be. It's the skill which the -- the camera, for example."
